Derye, var. Dere v. Obs., to hurt.
Des, obs. form of DAIS, DICE.
Des. in obs. words: see DEC-, DESC-, DESS-, DIS-.

Des. in obs. words: see DEC., DESC., DESC., DESS., DISS.. Des. prefix. Regular Romanic form of L. dis., in OIt., Sp., Pg., Pr., OFr.; in mod. Fr. retained (as dés.) before a vowel or silent h (déshabillé), otherwise reduced to dé. (OF. descharge, mod. décharge). In some cases apparently representing a late L. decx., for L. ex.. Partly from the frequent substitution of dis., des., for L. dē. in late L. and Romanic (Sec. DES., prefs.) perfect by through the phonetic reduction DE-prefix 6), partly through the phonetic reduction of des- to de-in later French, the two prefixes have in that language largely fallen together under the mod.F. de-. Early OF, words passed into English with the prefix in the form des (descharge, ME. descharge); here it was sometimes, in conformity with later OF. pronunciation, reduced to de- (OF. desmembre, demembre, ME. demembre); but usually the s was retained, and the prefix at length changed the s was retained, and the prehx at length changed back to the L. type dis- (discharge, dismembre, also spelt dys-) as was also done to some extent in French itself (descorde, now discorde).

In English, therefore, des- is merely the carlier form of D18- in words from OF., e g. desarm, desblame, descharge, desclaundre, descolour, desdain, desembogue, desere (= desheir), descrite (disherit), desgyse, deshnour, desinteressed, desjoyne, desjune, desquare, desmedia, description description description. desgyse, deshonour, desinteressed, desjoyne, desjune, desmail, desmay, demesure, desordein, desordere, desparage, desparple, despend, despense, despenple, desplay, desport, despreve (=disprove), despute, desray, destempre, desturb, destribute, etc. All these have a later form in DIB-, under which they are treated in this Dictionary. Only a few words became obsolete before disforms appeared. The prefix is exceptionally retained in descant, and it is occasionally found for DB- before a vowel, in chemical terms from modern French, as desoxalic, desoxybencoin, † desoxydate. In despatch, modern var. of DISPATCH, the spelling des- is not historical, desoxybenzoin, † desoxydate. In despatch, modern var. of DISPATCH, the spelling des- is not historical, but originated in an 18th c. etymological error. There are many words beginning with des- in which the s belongs to the root-word, and the prefix is de-, as descry, describe, describe, descred, despair, despite, despoil, destroy. From confusion of these with words in which des- is the prefix, they also were in late ME. often spelt with dis- (discry, discribe, etc.). And, on the other hand, words in dis- followed by s- were sometimes confused with words in dis- prefix, and so also written des- destinct, destress, etc.). Both these errors have been corrected in the later orthography.

Detent (ditent), sb.1 (Also 7 detton.) [a. F. deltente, OF. destente (Froissart, 14th c.), deriv. of detendre 'to slacken, unstretch, undo', in OF. destendre, f. des-, L. dis- privative (cf. DE- 6) + tendre to stretch. (In L. distendère the prefix had a different force: see DISTEND.)

The earliest application of the word in French was to the destente of the arbalest or cross-bow, whereby the strained string was released and the bolt discharged; hence it was transferred to the analogous part in fire-arms. In English, the word seems to have been viewed as connected with L. ditinère, ditent, and so with detain, detention, and to have been modified in meaning accordingly. The fact that the same part which allows of the escape of that which is detained or held tense, is also often the means of detention, favoured this misconception of the word.

used in precisely the same way, in the exclamatory der daus! was der daus . . .! LG. de duus! wat de duus!

The derivation of German daus is disputed: but there is reason to think that it is the same word as das daus = the Deuce! at dice (where 'two' is the lowest and most unlucky throw), the gender being changed when the gambler's exclamation of vexation 'the deuce! was metamorphosed into a personal expletive. A parallel development is known in Danish where the plural sb. pokker pocks, pox', has come to be felt as a singular, and to be taken for 'the devil', from its use in imprecations such as Gid pokker hande det! Would that a pox had that!, Pokker staa! det! A pox on that! Hrad pokker er det! What the pox (devil) is that? (See Pox.) (On other conjectural identifications see Rev. A. L. Mayhew in Academy 30 Jan. 1892, p. 111.)]

a. Bad luck, plague, mischief; in imprecations and exclamations, as a deuce on him! a deuce of his cane! b. The personification or spirit of mischief, the devil. Originally, in exclamatory and interjectional phrases; often as a mere expression of impatience or emphasis: as, what the († what a) deuce?, so, who, how, where, when the deuce? (the) deuce take it!, the deuce is in it! Later, in other phrases parallel to those under DEVIL: to play the deuce (with), the deuce and all, the deuce to pay, a deuce of a mess, etc.

In the quotations under a (to which the earliest instances belong), 'plague' or 'mischief' is evidently the sense: cf. the parallel and earlier 'A mischief (a pox, or a plague) on him!' 'Mischief or plague) take you!' 'What a mischief (pox, plague)!' This meaning is also possible in those under b1: cf. the parallel 'What the mischief (or the plague)! But mischief was personified already before 1700, and 'the dischief' was in the 18th c. a frequent euphemism for 'the devil'; that deuce was already taken in this sense in 1708 is evident from Motteux's use of it as=F. diantre, in b?. In the other quotations in the same group, 'deuce' plainly takes the place of 'devil' in well-known phrases; but such clearly personified uses as 'the deuce knows', 'to go to the deuce', appear late.

Applied historically to those books of the Scripture Canon as defined by the Council of Trent which are regarded by Roman Catholic divines as constituting a second Canon, accepted later than the first, but now of equal authority. It has been noted that the terms dēva-liģi 'writing of the gods', and nāga-liģi 'writing of the serpents', occur side by side in a list of 64 kinds of writing enumerated in the Buddhistic Lalitavistara of the 7th c.; but whether these terms have any connexion with dēva-nāgarī is unknown. [Here two original OF. and ME. words devis and devise have run together. The cetted form device represents phosphically MF. actual form device represents phonetically ME. devis, devis, a. OF. devis masc., 'division, partition, separation, difference, disposition, wish, desire, will' (Godefroy); 'speech, talke, discourse, a conference, or communication; deuising, conferring, or talking together; also, a deuice, inuention; distalking together; also, a deuice, inuention; disposition or appointment of '(Cotgr.); in mod.F. 'action of discoursing, conversation, talk, specification (of work to be done)'. But the form devise (when not a mere variant spelling of device: see below) represents OF. devise fem. 'division, separation, difference, heraldic device, will, testament, plan, design, wish, desire, liking, opinion conversation, conference, manner, quality, kind' (Godefroy); 'a deuice, posie, embleme, conceit, coat or cognizance borne; an inuention; a dinision; bound, meere, or marke diuiding land' (Cotgr.); in mod.F. 'action of dividing, that which divides or distinguishes, the motto of a shield, seal, etc., an adage'. The two French words correspond to an adage. The two French words correspond to Pr. devis, devisa, It. diviso, divisa, Romanic deriva. of dīvīs- ppl. stem of dīvīdēre to divide: see

Of atvis-ppl. stem of atviaere to divide: see Devise v.

The older word in ME. appears to have been devis, devys, but devise also appears from Caxton onward, and prob. earlier, at least in the phrase, to devise = F. à devise (sense 12). It is however very difficult to distinguish the two words, since devise, devyse occurs not only as the proper spelling of the repr. of OF. devise, but also, in northern and late ME., and in the 16th c., as a frequent spelling of ME. devis, mod. device. In rimes it is generally possible to separate devise = devis, device, from devise proper, but in other positions it is often impossible; nor does the sense give much help, because in OF. devis and devise partly coincided in meaning, while the English distinctions do not always agree with the French. In later times device gradually became the accepted form in all senses, except in that of 'testamentary bequest', which still remains Devise, q. v. There is also some reason to think that in the 17th c. devises (-sizès) was, in the south of England, used in the plural, when device (-sis) was written or at least pronounced in the singular: cf. house sing., houses (-siz) pl. The Gr. word was adopted in L. as diabolus, whence in the mod. The Gothic word was directly from Greek; the forms in the other Teutonic langs, were partly at least from Latin, and prob. adopted more or less independently of each other. Thus ON. djöfull regularly represents an original diabults. OE. dtobul, dtoful, dtofol can also be referred to an earlier diabul, diavol (cf. 1t. diavolo), to coming, through to, from earlier ta. The OE. dto would normally give modern devemblified in 15th. c., and in mod. Sc. and some Eng. dialects, but generally shortened at an earlier or later date to dto or div. In some, especially northern, dialects, the v was early vocalized or lost, leaving various monosyllabic forms, of which mod. Sc. deil, and Lancashire dule are types. The original Greek διάβολος was the word used by the LXX to render the Heb. [ΣΨ] sātān of the O.T.; in the Old Latin version it was regularly retained as diabolus; of

[a. OF. devise, devis (in same sense):-Romanic deviso, devisa, for L. divisus, and (late) divisa, from ppl. stem of dividere to divide, distribute, apportion, also, in med.L., edisponere testamento, to dispose by will. In med.L., divisa was in apportion, also, in med.L., = asyponere estamento, to dispose by will. In med.L., divisa was in common use = dīvīsio, originally 'division of goods by testament', 'whence also the testament itself is called dīvīsa [and dīvīsio]' (Du Cange). The same word as DEVICE sb., and formerly sometimes spelt device; the eventual victory of the form devise may be partly due to the influence of the med. I. divisa in wills, but is prob. more owing to the influence of the verb, and the close association of the sb. with it in this special sense.]

'A gift by will of freehold land, or of such rights arising out of or connected with land as are by English law classed with it as real property, is called a devise. Pollock, Land Laws (1887) v. 126) But this distinction is modern: cf. quot. 1641, and Devise v. 4.

pertaining to this formation and the geological period during which it was deposited.

The name was given in reference to the great development of these rocks as a marine formation in Devonshire. The rocks called 'Old Red Sandstone' in Scotland, West of England, and South Wales, are held to be lacustrine deposits of contemporary age, and included in the Devonian System; and the term is applied all over the world to a system of rocks having the same stratigraphical position, and containing organic remains similar to those of the Devonshire strata.

mod. F. devotion = Pr. devotio, Cat. devoció, Sp. devocion, It. devozione, all carly ad. L. devoción—m, n. of action from devovere to devote.

The order of development of the senses in L. was (1) the action of devoting or consecrating (to good or evil) by vow, (2) the condition of being devoted (to something good), devotedness, loyalty, fealty, allegiance, (3) tin Christian use) devotion to God and his service, piety, religious zeal. Only the Christian use passed from ecclesiastical L. into the Romanic langs. in the Middle Ages, and appears (with various extensions) in ME. from OF. After the Renascence, the etymological sense 'action of devoting' appeared in It., Fr., and Eng., at first only in reference to religious matters; in the 16th c. the word was extended to secular persons and things; this is specially noticed as a novelty in French in 1578 by H. Estienne (see Hatz. Darm.). As all the senses are now in Eng., a logical arrangement without regard to history would follow the order, 8 (including 4); 5 (with 6); 1 (with 2, 3); 7.]

In earlier spelling by Europeans these sounds were commonly represented by simple d, and in the general rectification of this to dh, the latter has been erroneously extended to several words having simple \( \mathbb{Z} \) da dental or \( \mathbb{Z} \) da lingual, or to words not really Indian, apparently under the notion that an oriental appearance is given to a word by spelling it with dh. Often changed back in late L. and Romanic popular words to the full form dis-, whence dismiss, disrupt; but in mod. Eng. generally di. In OF. and ME. often varying with de-, whence defer, demission sb.2, devise, from L. differre, dīmissio, dīvīsa. This took place especially bedimissio, divisa. This took place especially before a radical beginning with s + cons., where diwas phonetically identified with dis-, and shared in the alternation of dis-:-des- (DE-6, DES-, DIS-). Thus in ME. desperse, destinct, destill, destrain, destress for dis-; and per contra dispair, dispise, dispite, dispoil, distroy for de-. For its force in composition, see DIS-: it is not, like the latter, a living prefix. The historical pronunciation in an unstressed syllable is (di-); cf. divide, diversion, diminish; but in cases where there is a parallel word in de-, as delate, dilate, it is usually pronounced (dai-) for the sake of distinction, and the present ten-(doi-) for the sake of distinction, and the present tendency is to extend (doi-) to other words, as digest, dilute, diluvium, diradiation, direct, diverge, diverse, divest. This seems due partly to analysis of the compound, partly to the influence of stressed forms as digest sb. divers, in which the i is long and diphthongal.

Di- (doi, di), pref. 2, repr. Gr. δι- for δίs twice, as in δίγαμος twice married, δίγλωττος double-tongued, bilingual, δίδραχμος worth two drachmas, δίπτυχος double-folded. Hence, 1. Entering into numerous double-folded. Hence, 1. Entering into numerous Eng. words, mostly technical, as dichronic, dicotyledon, digamma, digamy, diglot, digraph, dilemma, diphthong, diptych, distich, disyllable; also in the nomenclature of Natural History as Diadelphia, Diandria, Didelphia, Diptera: which see in their alphabetical places. So in Crystallography, as in di-tetrahedron a crystal having twice four sides or planes; so di-hexahedron, etc.

2. As a living profix need in Chemisters with the

2. As a living prefix, used in Chemistry, with the names of compounds and derivatives, in the general sense 'twice, double', but with various special ap-

a. With the names of classes of compounds, as bromide, oxide, sulphide, cyanide, acetate, chlorate, nitrate, sulphate, amide, amine, etc., expressing the presence of two atoms or combining equivalents of the element or radical, as carbon dioxide valents of the element or radical, as carbon dioxide CO<sub>2</sub>, manganese dichloride Mn Cl<sub>2</sub>.

P In the earlier part of the 19th c. the use was different: the Latin prefix bi- was then used, where di- is now, to express two proportions of the chlorous constituent, as in bi-chloride of mercury = corrosive sublimate; while the Greek di- was used to express two proportions of the basic constituent; thus calomel, when supposed to contain two of mercury to one of chlorine, was called a di-chloride.

b. With the names of specific compounds (chiefly) cury to one of chlorine, was called a di-chloride.

b. With the names of specific compounds (chiefly organic), indicating a body having twice the formula of a given compound; used chiefly with the names of hypothetical radicals, to indicate the free names or nypothetical radicals, to indicate the free state of these (supposed to be that of a double molecule), as in di-allyl, dibenzyl, dicyanogen.

In diphenol, the use is less exact, since this substance has not exactly the constitution of two molecules of phenol.

C. With the name (or combining form of the name) of an element or radical, expressing the presence of two atoms or molecules of that bodly, as in dishade(a), discovery discrebus, discovery. presence of two atoms or molecules of that body, as in di-hydr(o)-, di-oxy-, di-carbon-, di- carb(o)-, di-nitr(o)-, di-ac(o)-, di-chlor(o)-, di-brom(o)-, di-iod(o)-, di-sulph(o)-, di-phosph(o)-, di-bor(o)-, di-arsen(o)-, di-ammoni(o)-, di-amm(o)-, di-amid(o)-, di-chlyl-. Used especially in organic chemistry, to indicate that two atoms or molecules of the body take the place of two atoms of hydrogen, as in dibromomethane, dichlorobensene.

d. These formations (c) are sometimes used

d. These formations (c) are sometimes used attributively or adjectively as separate words, as di-azo compounds, di-arbon series, di-phenyl group. So with other adjectives, as diacid, dihydric, diphenic.

On the preceding classes of words derivatives are formed, as diazotize, diazotype, dichromated.
 Di-, pref.<sup>3</sup>, the form of DIA- used before a vowel, as in di-acoustic, di-æresis, di-esis, di-ocese, di-optric, Dia-, pref.1, before a vowel di-, repr. Gr. &a-, δι-, the prep. διά through, during, across, by. [orig. *δριγα, from root of *δρο, δύο two, and so related to δίs, *δρίs twice (DI-2) and L. dis- a-two, asunder is, *δρίs twice (Di-2) and L. dis-a-two, saunder (Dis-, Di-1).] Much used in Greek in composition, in the senses 'through, thorough, thoroughly, apart', as in διάδρομος running through, διάλεκτος discourse, διάμετρος measure through or crosswise, diameter, διατριβή wearing through or away, pastime, δίοπτρον a thing for looking through, a spyglass. Hence in English, in a few old words through Latin and French, or Latin only, and in many modern scientific and technical words formed directly from Greek, or on Greek analogies.

Dia-, ρτεί-, in medical terms. In Greek such phrases as διά καρώων, διά κωδειῶν, διά μίσνος, διά μόρων, διά τριῶν πεπερέων, διά τοσάρων, διά πέντε, meaning 'made or consisting of nuts, of poppyheads, of vitriol, of mulberries, of three peppers, of four or of five (ingredients)', etc., were applied to medicaments of which these ingredients were the chief constituents, the full form implied being το inclicaments of which these ingredients were the chief constituents, the full form implied being το δια τριών πεπερέων ψάρμακον medicament made up of three peppers, etc. By the Latin physicians these phrases were treated as words, thus diachylon, diacisson, diacodion, diaglaucion, diagrydion, dia-libanon, diameliloton, diameliton, diamisyos, diamoron, diapente, diatessaron; and their was increased by many later formations of the same kind. Their grammatical character tended to be forgotten, final -ōn (Gr. -ov) being taken for -on (Gr. -ov), and then latinized as -um, e.g. diachylum, diaglaucium, dialibanum, dihæmatum (δι' αlμάτων); or a nominative was otherwise formed, as diapentes. The New Sydenham Society's Lexicon gives about eighty of these in mediæval and early modern

Several of these are given in French form by Cotgrave; many were formerly in English use, either in their mediæval-Latin form or partly anglicized. Phillips 1678-1706 has 'Dia, a Greek Preposition...set before the names of many medicinal compositions, to which that of the principal Ingredient is usually joined, by Physicians and Apothecaries, as usually joined, by Physicians and Apothecarics, as Diaprunum, Diascordium, Diascenna, etc.' Only a few, e.g. Diachtylum, survive in modern use: see also, in their alphabetical places, Diacatholicon, Diacodium, Diagrydium, Diambee, Diamoron, Diapalma, Diapreune, Diascord, Diasenna, Diatessaron, Among others, are the obsolete Diacarthami (-amy) [F. diacartami Cotgr.], a preparation of carthamy or bestard softron. 1. The art of critical examination into the truth of an opinion; the investigation of truth by discussion: in earlier English use, a synonym of Logic cussion: in earlier English use, a synonym of Logic as applied to formal rhetorical reasoning; logical argumentation or disputation.

Originally, the art of reasoning or disputation by question and answer, 'invented', according to Aristotle, by Zeno of Elea, and scientifically developed by Plato, by whom the term διαλεκτική was used in two senses, (a) the art of definition or discrimination of 'ideas', (b) the science which views the inter-relation of the ideas in the light of a single principle 'the good'; corresponding broadly to logic and metaphysic. By Aristotle the term was confined to the method of probable reasoning, as opposed to the demonstrative method of science. With the Stoics, rhetoric and dialectic formed the two branches of λογική, logic, in their application of the term; and down through the Middle Ages dialectica was the regular name of what is now called 'logic', in which sense accordingly dialectic and dialectics were first used in English.

app. under the influence of the numerous technical words beginning with the prefix DIA-, Gr. δια-. The differentiation of form in late L. was probably connected with the double signification acquired by adamas of 'diamond' and 'loadstone' (see Adamant); for, in all the languages, diamant with its cognates was at length restricted to the gem, as aimant was in F. to the loadstone. In English the dyamannd and adamasnd are distinguished from and opposed to each other ε τρο in Maundevile, ed. 1839, xiv. 161, ed. Roxb. Soc. xvii. 80; but adamant long retained the double sense of late L. adamas: thus Sherwood, 1623, has 'An Adamant stone, (F.) aimant, diamant, calamite, pierre marinière.' See Adamant.

The a of the middle syllable has tended to disappear since the 16th c., as shown by the spelling di'mond, dimond. Sheridan and other early orthoepists recognize the dissyllabic pronunciation, but most recent authorities reckon three syllables. In Shakspere the word is more frequently a trisyllable; but it is very generally dissyllabic in Pope, Thomson, Young, Cowper, Keats, and Tennyson.]

Diathermancy (doiăpō: mănsi). Physics. [ad. F. diathermansie, formed by Melloni, 1833, from Gr. διά through + θέρμανσις heating, f. θερμαίνειν to heat. The French ending follows the analogy of paralysie for Gr. παράλνσις. The Eng. ending heat. The French ending follows the analogy of paralysie for Gr. παράλυσις. The Eng. ending simulates the -ncy of transparency, buoyancy. Melloni's original term was diathermaneitt, from diathermane adj. (Ann. Chim. et Phys. 1833, LIII. 59, LV. 396, Phil. Mag. 1835 VII. 476); the latter was, according to him, if διά+θερμαίνω, in imitation of diaphane, f. διά+θερμαίνω to show.' But the analogy was not exact: diaphane is not derived from διά and φαίνω, only from the same root; and in θεριαίνω, -αίνω does not belong to the root, but is a verbal suffix, the stem being θερμ.. Diathermane was first rendered in Eng. diathermal, but after 1837 generally diathermanous. To express the notion of 'coloration ou teinte calorifique', Melloni introduced diathermansie, f. Gr. διά +θέρμανοις heating (Ann. Chim. et Phys. LV. 377). But the distinction between diathermaneité and diathermansie appears not to have been generally appreciated; in the Eng.

translation of Melloni's paper in Taylor's Scientific Memoirs, 1837, I. 72, diathermancy is used for both F. words, and English writers generally have used it in the sense of Melloni's diathermanétié. For these and other reasons, Melloni afterwards (Comptex Rendus, 1841, XIII. 875) abandoned his original terms, and gave a new nomenclature: viz. diahermanei edi, instead of diathermanei diathermanei (ad. Gr. Scaleppaoria) in place of diathermanetité; and thermochrose for diathermanei e colouring or tint of heat', with corresponding adj. thermochrotyne. But, though some English writers have thence used diathermic and diathermacy, most have continued to employ diathermanous and diathermaney, the latter in the sense not of Melloni's diathermaniste, but of his diathermanetité or diathermasie. 1 h. orige. The word has been used from ancient times in the reckoning of skins or hides; a letter of the Roman Emperor Valerian (A.D. 253-260) preserved by Trebellius Pollio, directs Zozimion, procurator of Syria, to furnish to Claudius, among other supplies, 'pellium tentoriarum decurias triginta', i. e. o dickers of skins for tents. Kluge points out that the early adoption of the Latin word by the Germans is explained by the tribute of skins which the latter had to pay to the Romans (Tacitus Ann. iv. 72), as well as by the fact that skins formed a leading item in the frontier trade between the Romans and the northern barbarians, as they have in the traffic between white men and the Indians in North America in modern times (see Dicker v.).]

Dicker, v. U.S. [? f. DICKER sb.! Quotation 1848 refers to the barter traffic on the Indian frontier in N. America. As skins have always formed a chief item in that trade, it has been suggested with much probability that the verb arose, in the sense 'to deal by the dicker, to deal in skins', among the traders with the Indians, and has thence extended in U. S. to trade by barter generally. If this be the fact, it is interesting that a word which passed from Latin into Germanic in special connexion with dealing in skins, and which has ever since in Europe been associated with this trade (see Dicker sb!), should, in America, through similar dealings between a civilized and uncivilized race, have received another development of use.]

1. A book dealing with the individual words of a language (or certain specified classes of them), so as to set forth their orthography, pronunciation, signification, and use, their synonyms, derivation, and history, or at least some of these facts: for convenience of reference, the words are arranged in some stated order, now, in most languages, alphabetical; and in larger dictionaries the information given is illustrated by quotations from literature; a word-book, vocabulary, or lexicon.

Dictionaries proper are of two kinds: those in which the meanings of the words of one language or dialect are given in another (or, in a polygiot dictionary, in two or more languages), and those in which the words of a language are treated and illustrated in this language itself. The former were the earlier.

Diddler (di'dlə1). [Of obscure origin.
Found first in the name of 'Jeremy Diddler', the chief character in Kenney's farce, 'Raising the Wind', brought out in 1803. The name was of course intended to be contemptuous and ludicrous, and it seems probable that it was formed on DIDDLE n's sense 1, or on the first element of the earlier diddle-daddle, diddle-dum (see DIDDLE-); it is also probable that Jeremy Diddler's characteristic methods of 'raising the wind', by continually borrowing small sums which he does not pay back, and otherwise sponging upon people, gave rise to the current sense of the verb (DIDDLE n's sense 2), of which 'diddler' is now naturally viewed as the agent-noun.]

The remarkable point in the history of the Eng. word is the change of de, des, to dy, dys, dyse, dyce, dice), in the ME. period. The oldest Chaucer MSS., Harl., Ellesm., Hengwrt, have dees, which also survived as late as 1484 in Caxton, but dys occurs in the other Chaucer MSS, and in rime in the Bodleian MS. of Kyng. Alisaunder, part of which is in the Auchinleck MS., attributed to the middle of the 14th c. Before 1500, dy, dys seem to have completely passed from the into the felass, the fortunes of which they have since shared. As in fence, the plural's retains its original breath sound, probably because these words were not felt as ordinary plurals, but as collective words; cf. the orig. plural truce, where the collective sense has now passed into a singular. This pronunciation is indicated in later spelling by ce: cf. the umlaut plurals lice, mice, advice, dwice, defence, in all which ce represents a phonetic and original s. In the newer senses where the plural is not collective, a form (daiz) of the ordinary type has arisen; cf. the non-collective later plural pennics.]

(dó-:-*dów, dáinn:-*dawans). In the other langs, and in Eng. a regular weak verb. No instance of the word is known in OE. literature (its stance of the word is known in OE. literature (its sense being expressed by steorfan, sweltan, or the periphrastic wesan dead, pa. t. wes dead: see DEAD I d) hence it is generally held to have been early lost in OE. (as in Gothic, and as subsequently in all the continental WGer. langs.), and re-adopted in late OE. or early ME. from Norse; but some think that the facts point rather to the preservation of an OE. diegan, digan, in some dialect; the word appears to have been in general use from the 12th c., even in the s.w. dialects (see Napier in Hist. Holy Rood, E.E.T.S., 1894). The ME. dēzen, dīghen came regularly down to 1500 as deye, which was retained in the North as dey, de, dee (still current from Lancashire to Scotland); but in standard English deghe was in 14th c. (in conformity with the common phonetic history of OE. eh, eah, eah, as in dye, eye, fly, high, lie, nigh, thigh, etc.) narrowed to dize, dighe, whence the later dye, die.

The oldest text of Cursor M. (Cotton) has only dey; in the later texts this is frequently altered to dighe, dye, when not in rime, in the late Trinity MS. sometimes even in rime, with change of text. Chaucer used both dey and dye, the C. T. (Ellesm. MS.) contains in the rimes 22 examples of deye and 50 of dye. Both forms are also used in the Wy-clifite version, and both occur in Caxton's works.

The stem daw. appears also in Gothic in the ppl. a. dauße, DEATH; also in afdojan (:-afdovjan), pa. pple. afdaud-(:-afdovid-) vexed, worried. (The relationship of Gothic divand, wadivanet, etc. is uncertain.) The simple verb has shown a notable tendency to die out, and leave its place to be taken by derivatives: thus in Gothic daußnan to die.)

Dif, prefix of L. origin, being the assimilated form of dis- before f, as in dif-ferre, dif-fūsio. In Romanic it became def-, which in OF. was subsequently reduced to de-; this occasionally appears in Eng., as defer from L. differre, OF. defferer, mod.F. defferer, defy from L. type diffidare, It. diffidare, disfidare, OF. desf-, deft-, defier, mod.F. defier. Usually, however, the Latin form of the prefix is used in Eng.: cf. differ, difficult, diffidence, diffuse. For its force, see DIS-: it is not, like the latter. a living suffix.

Differ (di fai), v. Also 6 dyffer (defer), 6-7 differre. [a. F. differer (in Froissart 14th c.), ad. L. differ-re to carry or bear apart, spread abroad, distract, protract, delay, defer; also intr. to tend apart or diversely in nature or character, to differ. The verb was used with both senses in F. in 14th c., and has continued to be so used till the present day. In has continued to be so used the transitive sense day. In English, it was taken first in the transitive sense, with stress difer (cf. confer, refer, prefer), which led at length to the transitive senses being written defer: see Defer v.<sup>1</sup>; the intrans. use, being closely related in sense to different, difference, apparently followed these words in stressing the first syllable. (Offer, suffer, which have the same stress, have a distinct form in French and Romanic.) And one transitive use, closely associated with the intrans., and with different, difference, has gone with these. In this way L. differre, F. differer, ME. differre, has been split into the two verbs defer to put off, and has been split into the two verbs defer to put off, and differ to make or be unlike. The pr. pple. differing occurs in Chaucer's Boethius; but instances of the verb in the form differ are rare before 1500.]
